Watches for men and women

Many watch brands make universal watches. As always, men like bigger watches. Women prefer smaller and ornate ones, though teenage girls also like to sport big watches. For women who are fascinated with jewellery and diamonds, companies like Citizen have introduced the diamond series of watches to increase the sales amongst women.

Beware of imitations

Imitations of expensive watches like Rolex and Cartier are readily available in the market. These look similar to the originals and are sold by roadside vendors who price them according to the value of the brand. So a Rolex imitation may sell for Rs 500, whereas a Cartier could be priced at Rs 800. The vendor may offer you the guarantee of a year for these watches. But you may not find the dealer at the same spot again.

What if something goes wrong?

Generally, watches come with two- or three-year limited warranty. To make the warranty valid, confirm the date of purchase with the retailer's seal indicating date, model, serial number and retailer's name, address and phone number.

Some watchmakers make it clear that the warranty will be void even if you get its battery changed by some non-authorised dealer. With brands like Titan that have presence across India, you can be assured of having access to a dealer locally. With the expensive brands (the Swiss brands, for example), one has to go back to the dealer one had purchased the watch from. These dealers are in touch with distributors of the watch company, and will send your watch to them for repairs.

Also, the high price tag of a watch doesn't guarantee its lasting quality. Things can go wrong, like it not keeping good time and the battery going weak too soon (at temperatures above 40°C, battery life significantly reduces and the battery fluid may even leak out). Buying online is also risky. So buy an expensive watch only from an authorised dealer with a good reputation. ●
