Rs 1 million with 34 per cent people receiving more than Rs 500,000 a year. The most noticeable shift in trend was visible in the group having over five years of experience. While 57 per cent of these senior employees drew above Rs 500,000 a year, 22 per cent of employees moved into the Rs 700,000-Rs 1 million band versus the 10 per cent in the 2-5 years of work experience reported 'no hike' in the survey, only a few firms like LG Electronics India actually handed out a definite amount to employees of all levels—it handed out an average increment of 14 per cent to its employees in January 2009. Most firms were not certain about the amount of increments they intended to dole out to staff. For instance, around 80 per cent firms have decided to limit the increment to 15 per cent; only 5 per cent have decided to provide a hike of more than 20 per cent. The scene is a daunting one if you compare it with last year's, when 28 per cent of the companies were ready to provide more than 21 per cent hike for the same level.

Things, however, pan out differently at the managerial level with around 71 per cent of the respondents stating that increments at this level were more closely associated with individual performances. In some companies, like A.V. Systems, top-level executives voluntarily declined to accept pay hikes and even paid a cut from their bonuses to help their firms stay afloat.

may even rise to anywhere between Rs 500,000-Rs 700,000 per annum, depending on the candidate's qualification, skill set, critical aspects of the job and payment practices of the company.

For mid-level employees with around 2-5 years of experience, the pay packet ranged from Rs 200,000-range. This is a clear indicator of the efforts made by companies to retain middle-management talent.

However, the trend changed at the senior level, which comprises employees with more than ten years of experience. Twenty-six per cent of these employees stayed in the Rs 1.5-
