Global semiconductor revenue to decline 17 per cent

Worldwide semiconductor revenue is on track to total $212 billion in 2009—a 17.1 per cent decline from 2008 revenue of $255 billion. While the outlook for 2009 has improved, Gartner analysts point out that all major segments of the semiconductor market are expected to experience double-digit decline in revenues this year.

The largest segment of the semiconductor market—application-specific standard products—will reach $57.2 billion, but this is a 16.5 per cent decline from 2008 revenue. The memory market is forecast to total $41 billion—a 13.5 per cent decline from last year. The micro-components segment (microprocessors, microcontroller units and digital signal processors) is on pace to reach $39.4 billion—a 19.2 per cent decline from 2008.

Semiconductor firms welcome UID project

Semiconductor companies in India, which have been adversely hit by the economic crisis, see hope for the sector in the proposed unique identification (UID) project. This smart card-based project will not only benefit those directly involved in the project but also result in the wider use of smart card technologies in the country.

President of the Indian Semiconductor Association, Poornima Shenoy, says that the project will enhance the growth of the domestic chip design industry. "Depending on the type of chips used and extent of back-end automation, the total demand for chips for the semiconductor industry could go up by approximately $1 billion over the period of the project (five years)," she says.

The demand for smart cards for UID is likely to fuel the demand for chips for card readers, terminals, biometric sensors, printers, etc.

Calendar of Forthcoming Electronics Fairs/Exhibitions/Seminars
