Mid IR sensors market worth US$ 7 billion by 2019

Mid IR sensor market at $789 million in 2012 could reach US$ 7 billion by 2019 as price performance increases and unit costs decrease from $ 3000 per unit to $ 300 and even to $ 8 or less per unit, according to ReportsnReports.com. The decrease in size of units from bench-top size devices to portable units makes them more useful across the board in every industry.

Applications anticipated to gain market traction include spectroscopic and bio-medical imaging, materials characterisation, standoff explosive detection, microscopy and non-destructive testing. Spectroscopy and imaging measurements are now easier, faster and more cost-effective than ever before. Homeland security, military communications, infrared countermeasures, chemical-warfare agent detection, explosives detection, medical diagnostics, imaging and industrial process controls, fire detection and remote gas-leak detection, pollution monitoring and real-time combustion controls are among the uses for the mid IR sensors.

Wearable tech prices dropping

Wearable tech is becoming more affordable now than it has ever been, thanks to Chinese wearable device makers, according to China wholesale company Chinavasion. Interest in smart garments and wearable tech has exploded over the last twelve months with tech companies of all countries producing smart watches, watch phones, video glasses and more.

Currently, wearable devices are on the very bleeding edge of cool technology. So most come with an equally high price tag, with gadget makers trading on both the novelty of the products and the company's branding. Smart watches, which only reach their full potential when paired with a smart phone, cost anywhere between 150 and 300 US dollars.

While western electronics manufacturers attempt to justify 1000 dollar prices with gimmicks like 3D capabilities
