Electromobility. Electric cars are cleaner, less noisy and more efficient than the traditional fuel vehicles but were not accepted in the past. Now, a new age of electromobility is dawning, offering great opportunities and possibilities. This rapid advancement of green technology in the form of hybrid and electric vehicles (EVs) has taken the use of electronics to a whole new level. The increased powertrain complexities in these vehicles rely on the sophisticated electronic controls to achieve maximum efficiency and reliability.

Market challenges

The car of tomorrow will make even more increased use of sophisticated, highly integrated electronic systems for safety, comfort and performance. Major challenges faced by the industry come from outside the traditional automotive areas. Consumer innovations at automotive quality, security and driving assistance systems present new opportunities and significant challenges.

Supply chain needs to improve further. Use of electronic systems enables many exciting areas of development but at the same time introduces a significant complexity issue which can only be addressed by a supply chain that works more effectively together. This presents all manufacturers with an opportunity as well as a challenge to streamline the process and accelerate innovation from R&D to on-the-road production vehicles.

The push towards the autonomous and smart cars has presented new challenges for all parts of the automotive supply
