

“The future is bright for those entrepreneurs who can provide teaching/hobby kits for hands-on experience to both students as well as teaching communities.—Parswanatha, managing director, Everest Infocom

the students and teachers in the last three years. This medium of practical learning is just what they need to reach heights. And, now that colleges have started realising its potential, all we see is busy years ahead!”

Raut says, “We are always ready in advance to meet the need for new products generated by addition of new experiments/subjects in the syllabus, as we have a wide range of products that meets the requirements of almost all the universities/technical boards of India. This year, we expect at least five times the growth in 2009.”

Shah plans to cater to the global customer base. He reasons, “It is a constantly growing market with a huge potential locally as well as internationally. We are designing products with global market in mind. We believe in universal educational kits that can help any Indian or international student. This year we expect at least 20 per cent growth in the second and third quarters compared to previous year.”

“The emerging technological trends include solutions for embedded, automation, device networking and wireless acquisition. The players are also becoming more and more open and focused on specific needs. The use of ICT has revolutionised the way business is done. Readiness to adapt to new technological changes and coming up with reliable products very fast and at competitive prices are the keys to success,” summarises Joshi.

The best for the Indian education and hobby kits market is yet to come, but a strong beginning in the right direction has been made! ●
