User interface. Almost all players come with USB connection. Look for USB 2.0 version, which transfers the songs faster than older versions.

Some companies provide connections which are exclusive to them. Apart from the connectivity, the interface with the PC should also be considered. Many companies provide a simple USB connectivity and do not require any particular software/interface/registrations. However, some players will need specific music library software and work only with them. It may not be possible for the users to use such players with more than one PC. For example, if your friend has some songs in his PC, it may not be possible for you to directly load them from his PC. You have to move his music to your regular PC and upload from there. High-end players come with connectivity options like Bluetooth. These allow songs transfer even directly to or from a mobile phone. They may even support Bluetooth headsets.

Miscellaneous. Most players come with voice/video recording, FM radio and games. Some may have personal organiser capability as well. ●
